

A short story provided by ChatGPT.

The Last Lantern

Every night, an old lighthouse keeper named Elias climbed the hundred steps to light the lantern.

For forty years, he had watched ships pass safely through the dark waters below. But one winter evening, a terrible storm arrived. Waves crashed against the rocks, and the wind shook the lighthouse walls.

As Elias reached the top, he noticed something strange: the lantern had gone out.

He searched for oil, matches, anything he could use. Nothing.

Then, through the rain, he saw a tiny fishing boat drifting dangerously close to the rocks.

Elias grabbed his own lantern and ran outside. Holding it above his head, he stood at the edge of the cliff and waved.

The fisherman saw the small light.

He turned the boat.

Minutes later, he disappeared safely into the darkness.

The next morning, Elias found a note tied to the lighthouse door:

"Your light was small, but it was enough."

Elias smiled.

Sometimes, he thought, we don't need to light the whole world. We only need to help someone find their way.